Capture of Port Royal and Temper of Southern Slaves

The New York Herald had a special correspondent on board the fleet which captured Port Royal. His accounts of the movements of the fleet and the battle, which resulted in victory, are highly exciting. The great battle came off on the 7th November. The main squadron consisted of nine vessels—the flanking squadron of six of a smaller class. The main squadron were to do the fighting of the batteries, while the flanking squadron were to drive off the rebel boats. Subsequently a portion of both squadrons took up an enfilading position above the battery, and then did good service, keeping up an incessant fire while the large ships were shifting their position. The little boats fought manfully.

THE FIGHT OPENS IN EARNEST

The Matanzas occupied a splendid position, thanks to her captain. Just as we had anchored, which was at five minutes before ten o'clock, the Hilton Head battery opened fire on the Wabash; in three minutes after, another shot from the battery. Now the cheers arose from all the transports; the ball had opened. Still the ships stood on and did not apparently notice the efforts of the rebels, until the Wabash came within good range with the face of the battery, when she fired a shell at them, which struck close to the battery. In a few minutes the Wabash opened a smart fire, throwing her shells into the woods, where the rebels were encamped in some force. After firing a few guns to ascertain the range, she opened a broadside fire on both batteries, which was one of the finest sights ever witnessed in this country. Now the troops did cheer. It was hearty and long. The other vessels now opened their fire, and the shells fell thick and fast into the battery. The rebel steamers now opened a smart fire, and it was the subject of general remark at the fine shots they made. The small gunboats now steamed rapidly ahead, and opened on them with their ten and eleven inch pivot guns.—At fifteen minutes past ten o'clock the fire was so hot that they up helm and started for Broad river, the gunboats chasing them. By this time the shells were bursting in the Bay Point battery at the rate of about two a minute, to which the rebels replied with rapidity and great execution.

A CHANGE OF POSITION

The main squadron changed position, and at twenty minutes before eleven the Wabash commenced operations on the Hilton Head battery in good earnest, delivering a broadside at one command. All her gun deck armament is nine inch shell guns, while on her spar deck they are eight-inch shell guns, with a ten-inch pivot aft, and a sixty-eight rifled Dahlgren gun on the forecastle. If you can imagine the scene you can do more than I can describe. The noise was terrific, while the bursting of the shells was as terrible as it was destructive. I counted no less than forty shells bursting at one time, and that right in the battery and in the woods where about eight hundred rebels lay. In addition to this the Susquehanna, with her tremendous battery, aided by the Bienville, the Pawnee and half a dozen smaller gunboats, was making the air brown with the sand, while the blue smoke of the explosion went to make up a most magnificent sight. The troops were wild with enthusiasm, and with deafening cheers they applauded the boldness and courage of the gallant naval officer. A moment or two elapsed—just time enough to load the guns—and again the scene was enacted afresh. The rebels replied with seven guns, which were worked splendidly, and from appearances they did considerable execution. After the second broadside the firing became less concerted, and it seemed as if each division on all the vessels were endeavoring to outvie each other in the rapidity with which they worked their guns.

THE HEIGHT OF THE BATTLE

The rebels fought hard. Some of the ships again changed positions. At half past eleven they drew near to the Hilton Head battery again, the rebels keeping up a brisk fire upon them as they approached. Occasionally the pivot guns of the Wabash and Susquehanna threw a shell into the battery, but the grand affair was yet to come. At ten minutes before twelve o'clock again the ships were enveloped in a dense cloud of white smoke, and in a few seconds after the shells were bursting into the battery in splendid manner. The sand was flying in every direction, and it seemed impossible that any one could be saved from death who was within the walls of the battery. Such a sight was never witnessed before. The rebels now worked only two guns, but I will give them the credit of working them beautifully. This style of fighting lasted just twenty minutes, and in that time over two hundred shells had burst over their heads and in the works. At ten minutes past twelve again the ships hauled off, firing a parting round as they left.

BAY POINT BATTERY HAULS DOWN ITS FLAG

Bay Point Battery ceased firing and hauled down its flag at noon. At thirty minutes past 12 the gun boats opened a terrible fire on Hilton Head, breaching it in several places and dismounting one of its guns. At ten minutes to one, the rebel boats disappeared, and it was supposed had gone round the point to take off the rebel troops. The Wabash was put in position for another closer conflict. She fired one gun and there was no reply to it, and at twenty minutes of three o'clock a whale boat, well manned, and with Com. Rodgers, and a white flag, started for the shore, and at three o'clock the Stars and Stripes floated over a deserted rebel battery. A portion of the troops were then disembarked. The rebel camp exhibited evidence of abandonment in great panic. Hot shot were yet in the furnace, dinners cooked and undisturbed, great quantities of ladies' clothing left, and every thing else conceivable, including lots of important letters. Further embarkation of troops was continued the next day. The dead were buried—eight in number—the damages to the vessels were in process of being repaired, and put in order for further service.

BEAUFORT DESERTED BY THE WHITES

Several steamers were sent up to make a reconnoisance of Beaufort. They were not molested. They found the place deserted by the whites—there being only two white men left in the place, but the contrabands were in large numbers running about, wild with joy, and pillaging the houses that were now untenanted. The scene was one of peculiar significance. The inhabitants had fled perfectly terror stricken, and they hardly knew where to seek shelter, fearing that we would follow them up immediately. They may be right in this surmise. There was a rumor that the whites had deliberately shot several of the slaves who had refused to follow them. Groups of blacks were observed to gaze upon the novel sight of war vessels, bearing the Stars and Stripes, with lively curiosity. On landing with a flag of truce, Lieut. Sproston was met by a number of the contrabands, who seemed greatly rejoiced to see him, and who cheered lustily for the Stars and Stripes. They informed the Lieutenant that there were two whites in the town, and took him to one, who met him at the door of his store, raising a flag of truce, and exhibiting in his manner every indication of fear. This man, a Northerner by birth, reported that the negroes were perfectly wild, and were plundering stores and dwellings, wantonly destroying property of every kind, and carrying off everything of a portable character that they could lay their hands upon. They had been worked up to a pitch of frenzy by their masters, who had shot several negroes who refused to accompany them into the woods and away from the village, to prevent them from communicating with the United States' forces, and that the negroes were retaliating in this manner, and that the lives of the remaining whites and their property were horribly insecure. A perfect saturnalia had begun.

The negroes reported that the rebel forces which lately occupied the fortifications on St. Phillip's Island had, with the Beaufort artillery, retired in a hurry [illegible] ferry, about ten miles distant, where there was a force of about a thousand men.

On these facts being known to Captain Ammen, he returned here and reported them to Commodore Dupont, who immediately ordered the Unadilla, Capt. Collins, the senior officer of the gunboats, to proceed to Beaufort and suppress any excesses that the negroes might commit in their efforts to retaliate against their masters, and to take particular pains to assure the white inhabitants that we had no intention to disturb them in their rights or in the enjoyment of private property, and in the spirit of his instructions and in accordance with these principles to use every effort to restore confidence, to bring the people back to their homes, when order shall be reestablished and personal safety and the rights of private property secured to all.

A [illegible] lot of blacks [illegible] on board one of the steamers, but they were informed that the blacks had not come to take them from their masters [illegible] a state of slavery. They [illegible] where they [illegible]. They [illegible] back and make arrangements to take all [illegible] Hilton Head. Two hundred have arrived there. They were the favorite slaves of the wealthiest planters of South Carolina. These negroes come and go [illegible] when they [illegible] that they are safe. They [illegible] cared for in every respect when within our lines, and we expect at no distant day to see the results of their [illegible] manifested in the [illegible] of intrenchments and the construction of fortifications. A couple of thousand negroes will be just the [illegible] need in intrenching ourselves, and by the time we are ready every shovel, spade and pick that we have will be in contrabands' hands, as they come in by fifties and hundreds.

THE CLIMATE OF PORT ROYAL.—The weather has been delightful since our arrival here. The climate is delicious, and all the splendors of the Indian summer add a beauty to sky, sea, and the green shores of the bay. Magnificent orange groves are found within a short distance of our camp, and the fruit, which is quite abundant, is of an excellent quality. There are thousands of bushels of sweet potatoes within our lines, upon which our men are feasting. Cotton and sugar cane fields, the former white with bursting balls and the latter ripe, and golden maize are to be found on the island. Indeed, everything about us seems to be as pleasant and satisfactory as one could desire. There could be no more desirable spot for winter quarters for our troops. They will certainly suffer but little from the cold, as that is the only discomfort in this latitude during the winter months.

THE REBELLION NOT POPULAR.—The white rebel prisoners, of which we have several, insist that the war is not popular with the masses of the people of South Carolina. It has already impoverished them, and cast a blight over society generally. These assertions are fully corroborated by recent letters found in the rebel camps. From the tenor of the latter it appears that the drafting of troops had commenced in Carolina in October last. Some men, rather than enter the army, had mutilated themselves rather than fight for the rebel flag.

THE NEW BASE OF OPERATIONS.—Port Royal was being strongly fortified, and the new arrivals of troops at Beaufort, since the above was written, show that we have only made a beginning with South Carolina.

Eastern News.

DESTRUCTION OF GUYANDOTTE, VA.—A letter from Cincinnati says, that the defeat of a Union party in Guyandotte was the result of trickery. At the time the Union men were there, there was a rebel force in the neighborhood of some 1000 men. These proposed with the assistance of the citizens of Guyandotte, to annihilate the Union troops. The Guyandotte people were to invite them about to their houses, treat them with kindness, and then by signal, invite the rebels in to the treat of murder. This was done, and our Union men were murdered by the citizens and soldiers in cold blood. Many, however, escaped. The murders were mostly effected in the houses. When Col. Zeigler arrived and learned the particulars of the affair he ordered the destruction of the town—the buildings were immediately fired and the whole town reduced to ashes.

THE EFFECT OF THE CAPTURE OF THE REBEL COMMISSIONERS.—A letter from New York of the 29th of November says:—The moral effect of the capture, on the cause of the Union, cannot but be beneficial. It is a heavy blow and a great discouragement to the enemy, and it is a source of congratulation to the loyal men of the United States. It is calculated to add [illegible] to the dismay and confusion of the rebels produced by the naval achievement at Port Royal, and holding the prisoners in despite of any mere technical points which may be raised by the English Government, will show the great powers of Europe that we are determined to battle to the last dollar and the last man for the maintenance of the integrity of the Union.

AFFAIRS IN VIRGINIA.—It is very evident that a great battle is impending between the two armies in Virginia. Both Northern and Southern accounts agree that one is inevitable. We had already received intelligence that the Confederate forces were withdrawing from the Potomac, but it seems that this movement had only been observed in the left wing of the rebel army. The centre was advancing, and in the mean time McClellan was making a forward movement. The battle [illegible] four hundred thousand men will be engaged, assisted by artillery more formidable than was ever before brought into one field.—N. Y. Herald.

THE TRAITOR BRECKINRIDGE.—A dispatch from Nashville, published in the Memphis Appeal, Nov. 11th, says: "Gen. Breckinridge arrived here to day from Richmond." He is assigned to the command of a brigade at Bowling Green.

The Country from Lewiston to Salmon.—A letter writer thus describes it: "I arrived at the diggings in eight days' journey from Lewiston, after traveling over the finest grazing country the eye ever beheld, and well adapted to agriculture, though timber is not so plenty as would suit the convenience of all."

A letter from an officer at Beaufort says—"The slaves are wild with excitement and [illegible]. They say they have been shot down like dogs because they would not go with their masters."

The fire at Charleston, it is well said, must have been a beacon fire to the scattered unionists of South Carolina—a fire of doom to the terror smitten confederates."

Gen. McClellan would not allow two bands of music to serenade his wife. He is opposed to all that sort of thing.

The Alta says that a united effort will be made in Congress to procure the restoration of the pony express.

A Balloon Examination.—A night or two since the balloonists, Lane and Dan St[...]kles, made an ascension from the Maryland shore of the Potomac [illegible] Quantico Creek. The balloon was lifted almost directly over some of the rebel camps, and they had an excellent opportunity by means of the camp fires visible to determine the position of the enemy. The fires were lighted from Occoquan [illegible] and they continued down along the line of the road to the vicinity of Dumfries. They were also visible along the two roads as far back as Brents[ville]. There is no doubt of the rebels being present in strong force, and that they have not fallen back, as had been alleged by some of the correspondence from the city.
